Biographical / Historical Note

The first railroad in Louisiana dates back to 1830-31, with the Pontchartrain Rail Company, and the train was pulled by horses. Due to the strength of the trade along the Mississippi River, early railway trade and travel was not strong; the efforts to expand the railways were slow to start and often failed. The progress that had been made came to a crashing halt during the Civil War when the New Orleans' commercial economy collapsed. It was not until the 1870s, that the rail construction could resume until completion. By the end of the 19th century, Louisiana became one of the nation's major rail centers, with a number of passenger freight railroads coming into New Orleans everyday.

The 1900s saw trains offering the height of comfort for their passengers. With the creation of the stainless steel "Streamliners" in the 1930s, trains were now more lightweight and faster than those made of wood. This also allowed for the inclusion of more passenger amenities. Such as galley style dinning cars where meals were prepared on site, and the inclusion of "roomettes" which offered a bed, sink, and small toilet.

Early passenger trains were typically privately funded regional railroads, sometimes only traveling along one or two routes within an area. With the rise of the automobile, the popularity of passenger rail travel diminished and many of the small regional railroads went out of business. Other railroads, instead of closing, began to merge to create a railway system that can span the entire country. Today, Louisiana's railroad is primarily freight travel. The New Orleans Union Station Passenger Terminal is staffed by Amtrak, where once thirteen trains arrived daily, there are now only four.
